

An ode to the Atlantic soul

On the rugged coast of Cap Ferret, nestled among pines, dunes, and the sea, lies Oyat House – a coastal retreat that rediscovers the essence of Atlantic charm. Designed by interior designer Joséphine Fossey for the Beauvallon Group, this first holiday home in their collection is an invitation to simplicity, connection, and tranquility. Here, everything revolves around the rhythm of nature: the play of light on the sand, the rustle of pine needles, the salty breeze flowing through open windows.

Designed for families and togetherness, the house unfolds around a generous living space where a sculptural fireplace forms the beating heart. The open-plan kitchen, with its travertine dining table, invites long, relaxed meals, moments where time fades and conversations flow naturally. Large openings connect indoors and outdoors, allowing the interior to flow into the garden and pool, surrounded by five bright, serene suites, each offering its own view of the surrounding dune landscape.

The interior breathes the language of the Atlantic landscape: wood paneling, mineral textures, and a color palette of off-white, sand, and deep brown reflect the surroundings in subtle, poetic nuances. Nothing feels forced—everything seems natural, as if the house has always been there. Joséphine Fossey weaves a subtle layering of colonial-inspired influences, antique finds, and artisanal objects throughout this coastal home. Each piece, from carefully selected furniture to handmade ceramics, tells a story of travel, memories, and craftsmanship. The result is an atmosphere that feels simultaneously global and local, refined yet never distant.

Every detail bears the signature of human hand and attention

The project demonstrates a deep respect for place and tradition. Local makers and artisans were given a prominent role in the finishing touches, giving the house a tangible authenticity. Every detail, from woodwork to upholstery, bears the signature of human touch and attention.

With Maison Oyat, Joséphine Fossey offers more than a holiday home: she presents a sensitive interpretation of Cap Ferret: a place where land and sea, silence and conviviality, past and present, merge. A house designed not just to stay, but to breathe with its surroundings.
